WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Weak high pressure over the Northern California this morning will move off to the east by this afternoon as a strong low pressure system approaches from the north. Far northern portions of the region will see high clouds and westerly winds increase late today. Temperatures across the region will likely be a few degrees cooler than on Sunday, but inland areas will have another day with minimum RH near 10-20%. A few showers and thunderstorms are possible over the Central Sierra this afternoon. There is a remote chance of a few lightning strikes toward the south end of the Lake Tahoe region. The low pressure system mentioned above will drop far enough south on Tuesday to produce noticeably cooler, cloudier and windier weather across the entire North Ops region. A few isolated showers are possible in far northern areas late Tuesday. There is a much better chance of showers and isolated thunderstorms mainly in northern portions of the region Wednesday through Thursday night. Areas to the south may see isolated activity then as well. High pressure will build in from the Desert southwest beginning over the weekend and produce a significant warming and drying trend that may last a week or so.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

The trough that brought showers and thunderstorms to parts of the region this past weekend is now moving to the east of Southern California. Weak high pressure will build into the district today and Tuesday with warmer and drier weather expected. Although still below normal, daytime highs will be in the upper 70s to upper 80s in the valleys, with low 90s in the San Joaquin Valley. In the mountains, highs this afternoon will be in the 60s to low 70s, except mid-50s to mid-60s in the Sierra. There may be a handful of showers and thunderstorms over the eastern Sierra today, but it should stay dry elsewhere around Southern California. Winds will generally be light across Southern California during the next couple of days, but it will be breezy through the desert passes during the afternoon and evening hours. A deep trough will drop into the Pacific Northwest on Tuesday and will be just off the Northern California coast by Thursday afternoon. This will set up a broad southwest flow aloft over Southern California resulting in seasonable temperatures along with moderate onshore flow. The marine layer will likely remain deep enough to generate areas of night and morning low clouds and fog west of the coastal ranges most days this week. It will become breezy to locally windy along the central coast and throughout the desert areas starting mid-week. Strong high pressure will begin to build into Southern California this weekend and into early next week with some of hottest weather of the season expected throughout the inland areas starting Saturday. Daytime highs Sunday and Monday may reach record levels. In addition to the heat, humidity values will drop into the single digits and teens away from the coast with poor overnight recovery. However, winds during this time are expected to be light and variable.
